

Reporting Marks Used on Freight Cars In North America

© Copyright 2008 Eric A. Neubauer

At one time, freight car lettering was left entirely to the owner's discretion. When the large variety of lettering arrangements combined with a significant number of owner names with identical or similar initials, it caused frequent confusion as cars travelled over multiple railroads during their journeys. A standardized system of initials called reporting marks began in about 1911. Each company was to have a unique set of initials making car accounting quicker and more accurate. Assignment of reporting marks was a gradual process that started with the private owners, but soon expanded to include railroad owners. For unknown reasons, some owners held out for quite a while. For example, the Southern Railway did not get their SOU reporting marks until the 1970s.

Most reporting marks were one to four letters, but a few had five letters. Some included an ampersand (&). Those of private companies ended with X in order to differentiate them from railroad companies. When car accounting was computerized, all ampersands and five-letter marks were eliminated. For example, D&RGW became DRGW. Despite the accounting change, the Denver & Rio Grande Western continued to put the traditional D&RGW on their cars.

The following list includes over 3,000 reporting marks listed as of January, 2008. The list includes some companies that no longer exist, some that never had freight cars, and some that no longer have freight cars. The number of cars operating under each reporting mark as of January, 2008, is given as follows:

Size as of January, 2008:

- A no freight cars in interchange service
- B less than 100 freight cars in interchange service
- C at least 100 but less than 1,000 freight cars in interchange service
- D at least 1,000 but less than 10,000 freight cars in interchange service
- E at least 10,000 but less than 50,000 freight cars in interchange service
- F at least 50,000 freight cars in interchange service

The principal business the rail cars are used in is also given to the extent it could be determined. Some companies are so diversified that being specific isn't possible.

Reporting marks are often included when companies change hands, so some of the previous company names are shown.

I have personally been writing about railroads for over 26 years. If you would like more information about railroad cars, the following link will take you to Railroad Car History where you can find special features, information about my other books, and contact me by e-mail.

Railroad Car History is a cooperative website created by David Casdorff, Eric Neubauer and Darrell Sawyer. Collectively, we are the leading publisher of electronic books on railroad subjects. Each of us maintains a section within the site. Mine is Eric's Railroad Car History.
